In November 2003, trade ministers from 31 countries met in Miami, Florida to negotiate the Free Trade Area of the Americas (FTAA). The FTAA threatens to devastate workers, the environment, and public services like health care, education, and water, and to destroy indigenous rights and cultural diversity across North, Central, and South America.

The thousands of union members, environmentalists, feminists, anarchists, students, farm workers, independent media makers, and human rights activists who converged on Miami to struggle against the FTAA were brutally attacked with rubber bullets, pepper spray, electric guns, shock batons, and embedded reporters, all coordinated by the new United States Department of Homeland Security.

Against this model of paramilitary oppression, information warfare, and corporate rule, we offered models of grassroots resistance, creative action, and solidarity.

The FTAA Indymedia video working group shot over a hundred hours of video in Miami, and is proud to present the resulting full length documentary film "The Miami Model".
